THE PERSONALITY OF LIBRARIES

Like people, libraries also have their own individual characters, their own personalities, and meeting them gives as much pleasure or discomfort as meeting people. There is always some preconceived thrill in getting acquainted with an unknown library, but whether this acquaintance turns into permanent friendship depends much upon our first impressions.

What exactly makes up the personality of a library would be hard to define. It is not the building alone, nor the reading room, nor the books, nor the service, nor the manners of the staff, but it must be a sort of combination of all these factors, not to forget the general surroundings, the climate, and other environmental elements.

During my works and travels I have met many types of library buildings, haughty palaces and small crowded rooms rented in apartment buildings, reading rooms with magnificent frescos and others with white-washed walls and ceilings, stacks of public libraries with the latest type of steel structure and libraries of humble Carmelite monks with rough boards used for book shelves.

I saw libraries in forests of palms, others located in big thoroughfares of large metropolitan cities, libraries with not more than an armful of books, sometimes on the hot top floor of an obscure little institution, and others with millions of publications arranged in many air-cooled wings of huge museum-like buildings. But, as I now recall all of them, my impressions of the library structure are colored by the personality of those human beings, the librarians and their assistants, I came in contact with.

My building pleasure of entering a beautiful library building, and seeing the orderly arrangement of books might be immediately destroyed if I had to go through a number of offices to be duly registered and to get a permit to see the inner sanctum, where I would find probably the sour face of a misanthropic librarian. I never would want to see him or his library again.

Often, my path would turn, however, to some shabby old library in a dark alley where I would be sure to feel at home. There, I would find in the librarian not only a man of science but also a warm-hearted human being with an open mind for discussion and with an understanding of my problems.

His personality would emanate from the whole building, and this would change the apparent disorder of books into a regularly organized army of references, transforming the dust on the shelves and making me see gilt edges on all the dusty books. It would be the good fellowship of his assistant which would turn the complexities of the library catalog into an easy tool for me. It might be also the smile on the face of the clerk at the loan desk which allowed me to forget the fine paid for an overdue pamphlet.

Indeed, the personality of the librarian and of the members of his staff is what gives pleasure or discomfort to the visitor of any library. Service with a smile is what counts. This is the real treasure of a library, and it can compensate for all inadequacies either in the style of building, or in the number of holdings. The personality and the charm of the librarian is what we remember and what lingers longer than the number of book rarities or incunabula.
